

I believe that the FCC should not mandate standards about the existence of 'broadcast flags' and how equipment should handle them.

The FCC has done its job in establishing the broadcast standards. Let anything else related to the format (including such nuances as a 'broadcast flag') be handled by market forces, that is, between the content providers, the equipment manufacturers and the consumers. I think that any solution reached by market equilibrium is fairer to all involved, unlike content-producer-funded lobbying for protective features (ie. the broadcast flag)
